This class will review a wide range of theories that explain the development and maintenance of gender. We will focus both on how gender stratification has developed historically and how and why individuals "do gender" in their daily lives. We begin with basic theoretical readings that approach the topic across various levels of analysis, and then proceed to examine contemporary research. The theoretical section of the seminar will be organized by the framework of conceptualizing gender as a social structure. We will focus on theoretical developments and debates. We will also consider how gender intersects with other systems of inequality and privilege such as race/ethnicity, class, age, and sexuality. Due to limitations of the length of the seminar, we will not be able to cover all substantive issues that relate to gender; but I would be pleased to do my best to provide you with some "recommended" readings in other areas if asked.

This is a seminar appropriate for graduate students in the social sciences, and open to doctoral students in sociology. Students from other disciplines should have taken some graduate training in sociological theories or women's and gender studies.

Le lezioni si terranno in lingua inglese.

Rivolto a studenti del Dipartimento di Sociologia e Ricerca Sociale sia triennali che magistrali.
